WRITING TIP

GRAMMAR: Few words confuse writers more than affect and effect. Here's a simple way to keep them straight, at least most of the time:

- AFFECT is almost always a VERB. It means to influence. Example. The weather affects attendance at an outdoor concert.
- EFFECT is almost always a NOUN. It means a result. Example: The effect of too much sun can be a sunburn.
- So to decide which one to use, simply determine whether you need a verb (affect) or noun (effect).
- This rule of thumb works almost all the time, but there are exceptions: Affect can be used as a noun (meaning an emotional state or pretentious behavior) and effect can be used as a verb (meaning to bring about), however use of the words in these ways is far, far less common.

OPPORTUNITY: WRITING WORKSHOP FOR SCIENTISTS

Interested in developing your ability to communicate why science matters? Apply for the inaugural online workshop being offered this fall and spring by Scientific American and the Alan Alda Center for Communicating Science at Stony Brook University. The workshop will help scientists write blogs and op-eds for magazines, newspapers, and other news outlets. Participants for the free program are selected competitively.

WRITING CAFÉ

Writing Café is closed for the summer. If you're looking for a space to write without the distractions of your office, don't forget Scott Library. If you haven't visited in a while, you'll find new seating and desk options. The library is open 24/7, and floors 3 and 4 are specifically designated as quiet floors.
