Synergy

Synergy. The concept is common in medicine — two elements becoming much stronger when combined.

We see synergy in virtually every area of Jefferson. Dissatisfied with the standard model of “team education” — a model that often merely frustrates students — we designed a unique approach that promises to become the gold standard throughout the country. In research, our bench investigators and clinicians have broken down traditional barriers to become partners, bringing medical discoveries to patients at record speeds. And in a groundbreaking agreement this fall, we formalized our collaboration with the University of Delaware, laying the foundation for a new partnership in health sciences education.

Through this teamwork, we are creating programs far stronger than any one department or healthcare institution could devise alone.

At many institutions, “team education” means throwing students majoring in medicine, physical therapy and nursing together without training and giving them a problem to solve as a team. This “sink or swim” approach often ends with students frowning. We wanted a better model.

First, we built a unique facility, the Dorrance H. Hamilton Building, dedicated to team-based health care education. This facility houses the latest, state-of-the-art simulation environments for realistic education of the entire healthcare continuum, from undergraduate to house staff.

Under the guidance of Drs. Dale and Katherine Berg, co-directors of the Clinical Skills and Simulation Center, faculty members from medicine, physical and occupational therapy and nursing created a story line about “Mr. Voight,” a patient in a persistent vegetative state. Students taking “The Team Approach to End of Life Issues” watch sections of a video about Mr. Voight that pertain specifically to them, then discuss the challenges of the case and the reactions of Mr. Voight’s case together.

The approach redefines and reinvigorates team education. And it’s unique to Jefferson.

With research, information from the human genome project and new computer software have allowed our lab investigators and clinical researchers to form close partnerships, getting discoveries to patients quicker than ever before. On the other side, clinicians feed information to researchers, allowing them to draw parallels between conditions. This synergy between clinicians and researchers has allowed us to identify risk factors for surgical complications, giving physicians a chance to head off life-threatening problems long before a patient even enters an OR.

Education and research converge in our new agreement with the University of Delaware. Under arrangements before this fall, students could receive dual degrees, beginning their education at Delaware and finishing in occupational therapy or pharmacy at Jefferson. Under our new partnership, a joint steering committee is focusing on ways to expand in other areas, including nursing, health policy, public health, bioinformatics and biomedical engineering. We will open some classes to Delaware students, and our students will have access to courses in Newark. We also will jointly develop distance-learning classes and colloquia.

This agreement will strengthen Jefferson’s pipeline to gifted Delaware students interested in pursuing advanced degrees in the health sciences and will give them a clear picture of the opportunities we offer.

The collaboration also holds great promise for research that will bring grants to both institutions. Again playing to our strengths, a task force is focusing on joint projects in cancer biology and cardiovascular and neuroscience research. Delaware’s exemplary biomedical engineering department offers our investigators priceless resources in nanotechnology, virtual reality and the development of medical devices.

The next step involves strengthening our partnerships and applying for one of the most prestigious federal awards available, a Clinical and Translational Science Award. In winning the distinction, we will join an elite collaboration of the nation’s greatest healthcare centers, all working together to bring laboratory discoveries into the clinic.

At Jefferson, we know the greatness that comes from synergy and how to capture it.

Sincerely,

Robert L. Barchi, MD, PhD

George McClellan began Jefferson Medical College with the idea that medical school should consist of students taught in a clinical setting by superb master teachers. Almost 185 years later, this tradition continues at Jefferson. It begins when students encounter our basic science teachers and it continues into their clinical years. Although during the first two years students are taught basic sciences, the faculty attempts to marry science education with lessons of the clinical years. First- and second-year students are exposed to the clinical setting in a much more concerted way than was the case 10 years ago. Today, that process begins with simulation and standardized patients, and, as I discussed in the spring Bulletin, patients as mentors. We understand that patients can be the best teachers. As physicians, our lifelong experience attests to that.

Because academic excellence is our priority, we must support faculty who teach in addition to researching and providing compassionate clinical care. Through a careful model of how we allocate our precious resources, we reserve a clear funding line that goes directly to people who spend their time instructing future physicians.

Each year, these faculty members undergo a review that includes input from the students as well as the dean’s staff. Our students actively evaluate our faculty. From these faculty evaluations, we know how highly JMC students value the quality of the faculty and the teaching and mentoring that they receive.

In addition to faculty evaluations, I’ve just completed the budgeting process for the upcoming fiscal year. In this coming academic year again, the faculty who are putting in the time and effort and are doing a quality job will be funded to teach. It’s our first priority for tuition dollars.

At Jefferson, we back up our beliefs by recognizing master teachers. For the fifth year we have rewarded faculty—full-time as well as volunteer faculty—identified by students, departments, department chairs and the medical college as serving as exemplary seasoned teachers. We honor them by awarding the Master Teachers Award at Jefferson at a dinner. And in McClellan’s memory, we rely on these master teachers to mentor other teachers.

As I write this column, I am interim dean at Jefferson Medical College. By the time you read this column, Mark L. Tykocinski will have taken the reins as dean and I will have a new leadership role. I thank you for your support over the last year and look forward to continuing to serve Thomas Jefferson University.

Sincerely,

Michael J. Vergare, MD
Interim Dean, Jefferson Medical College
JMC’s New Dean: A Rare Combination

In Mark L. Tykocinski, MD, Jefferson found a rare combination for dean of the Medical College: an internationally renowned physician, researcher and educator with administrative expertise from one of the nation’s top universities.

Robert L. Barchi, MD, PhD, announced Tykocinski’s appointment on November 10. “He is the ideal person to lead Jefferson Medical College,” Barchi said. “His vision and creativity in the research laboratory have resulted in discoveries that have advanced our understanding of human biology, while his commitment to clinical care has helped to redefine our concept of modern diagnostic medicine.”

Tykocinski comes to Jefferson from the University of Pennsylvania, where he served as professor and chair of the Department of Pathology and Laboratory Medicine, one of the School of Medicine’s largest with 130 faculty members and 1,000 staff members. His leadership helped establish his unit as first in the country among pathology departments in grants, receiving almost $50 million annually from the National Institutes of Health (NIH).

In research, Tykocinski holds several patents in the fields of molecular and cellular immunology, and his findings have contributed to the development of innovative strategies for treating cancer and autoimmune diseases. He also pioneered a novel class of eukaryotic expression vectors, now widely used by other laboratories around the world.

“My leadership roles over the past few years have given me personal experience and perspective on what it takes for an academic medical center to flourish, and I look forward to using this experience to build upon the longstanding tradition of excellence and pre-eminence enjoyed by Jefferson,” said Tykocinski.

During his tenure at Penn, Tykocinski showed a deep commitment to education. He developed residency and fellowship training programs that are considered second to none nationwide. Undergraduate students rank the Pathology Department as one of Penn’s best.

Tykocinski’s appointment comes after an extensive national search led by University Trustee Charles G. Kopp, Esq. “Dr. Tykocinski’s proven leadership abilities and his exceptional academic background were the compelling factors in his selection by the board,” board Chairman Brian G. Harrison said.

As dean, Tykocinski has primary responsibility for the quality of the school’s medical education. In addition, he will guide the research mission of the college and its nearly 1,000 full-time faculty and will provide the leadership and direction necessary to ensure the continued success of the clinical practice plan for faculty.

Tykocinski is a nationally recognized leader in the field of pathology and laboratory medicine. He serves as president of the Association of Pathology Chairs, is past president of the American Society for Investigative Pathology and serves on the editorial board for the American Journal of Pathology and Molecular Oncology.

In 1995, he received the Warner-Lambert/Parke-Davis Award for Outstanding Research from the American Society for Investigative Pathology. He was honored as an AOA Distinguished Alumnus at New York University and was an honorary inductee to the Alpha Omega Alpha Honor Medical Society in 2005.

Tykocinski also held prominent university and medical school appointments at Case Western Reserve University. He earned a bachelor of arts in biology magna cum laude from Yale University in 1974 and was awarded his medical degree from New York University in 1978. He completed his internship at Columbia-Presbyterian Medical Center in New York City in 1979 and his residency training at New York University in 1981. He spent the next two years as a fellow in the Laboratory of Immunogenetics of the National Institute of Allergy and Infectious Diseases at the NIH in Bethesda, Maryland.
Antibody to Breast-Cancer Protein Blocks Metastasis, Research Shows

Scientists have made a key discovery about the mechanism of breast cancer metastasis, the process by which cancer spreads. Focusing on a gene named “Dachshund,” or DACH1, they are beginning to pinpoint new therapeutic targets to halt the spread of cancer.

Reporting their findings in the Proceedings of the National Academy of Sciences, researchers led by Richard Pestell, MD, PhD, director of the Kimmel Cancer Center at Jefferson and professor and chair of cancer biology, showed that breast cancer cells secrete a common inflammatory protein, IL-8. When the scientists used DACH1 gene therapy replacement in the tumor (A) or blocked the IL-8 protein in mice with an antibody (B), they halted the spread of breast cancer to the lungs.

In addition, the team found that the DACH1 gene normally blocks the production of IL-8.

DACH1 is frequently lost or inactive in invasive breast cancer and can prevent the migration and invasion of breast cancer cells. The finding suggests that IL-8 is a potential target for new therapies to block breast cancer spread.

Because the researchers had previously discovered that DACH1 is lost in invasive breast cancers that carry poor prognoses, they investigated its potential role in the cancer cells’ ability to migrate and invade, the prelude to metastasis. They focused on its effects on cancer-causing oncogenes, such as Ras and Myc.

In a series of experiments, the scientists, led by Pestell and first author Kongming Wu, PhD, assistant professor of cancer biology, looked at the effects of adding DACH1 to breast cells made cancerous by various oncogenes. When they added DACH1 to Ras-induced breast cancer cells, for example, they saw a greater than 75 percent reduction in cell migration. Cells turned cancerous by the oncogene Erbb2 showed a 50 percent drop in migration. Cells made cancerous by Myc also had 50 percent less migration.
A clinical study on patients who have suffered a heart attack found that a partially purified extract of Chinese red yeast rice, Xuezhikang (XZK), reduced the risk of repeat heart attacks by 45 percent, revascularization, cardiovascular mortality and total mortality by one-third and cancer mortality by two-thirds. The multicenter, randomized, double-blind study was conducted on almost 5,000 patients, ranging in age from 18–70 over a five-year period at more than 60 hospitals in the People’s Republic of China. Corresponding author David M. Capuzzi, MD, PhD, director of the cardiovascular disease prevention program at Jefferson’s Myrna Brind Center of Integrative Medicine, and Zoniang Lu, MD, PhD, from the Fuwai Hospital at the Chinese Academy of Medical Science, report their findings in the American Journal of Cardiology.

“It’s very exciting because this is a natural product and had very few adverse side effects including no abnormal blood changes,” said Capuzzi. “People in the Far East have been taking Chinese red yeast rice as food for thousands of years, but no one has ever studied it clinically in a double-blind manner with a purified product against a placebo group until now, and we are pleased with the results. However, people in the United States should know that the commercially available over-the-counter supplement found in your average health food store is not what was studied here. Those over-the-counter supplements are not regulated, so exact amounts of active ingredient are unknown and their efficacy has not been studied yet.”

The study looked at patients who had suffered a heart attack in the previous year. Study participants were given two 300-milligram XZK capsules or a placebo and tracked over a five-year period. The XZK capsules contained a combination of lovastatin, lovastatin hydroxyl acid, ergosterol and other components.

“I think it is surprising that a natural product like XZK would have this great an effect,” said Capuzzi. “If further testing and study prove true, my hope is that XZK becomes an important therapeutic agent to treat cardiovascular disorders and in the prevention of disease whether someone has had a heart attack or not. But it is important to recognize the fact we do not know exactly how Chinese red yeast rice works. The exact ingredients from the XZK capsules have not been isolated and studied yet. Still the results were so profound, even out performing statins prescribed in numerous Western populations, that further study should certainly be investigated.”
The human body has not changed since the advent of modern medicine, but the way students have learned about it has changed regularly and sometimes radically, influenced by new ideas in educational theory, medical practice and technology. We talked with several Jefferson professors and alumni to bring some of these important modifications to light.
“There are wonderful opportunities for students to learn clinical care. What students know now, it took us awhile to learn.”

The course also teaches beginning evidence-based medicine. “We cover quite a bit of introduction to behavioral medicine—the doctor-patient relationship; talk about normal development of the life cycle and the approach to the patient; introductory psychology and psychiatry; normal and abnormal mental health,” Jerpbak says.

This year, students are reading Body of Work by Christine Montross, MD. Montross writes about her experiences with her first patient—her cadaver—as a first-year medical student. The book gives students a starting point to discuss their emotions, Jerpbak says. “Twelve weeks in human form and development is a huge transition for the students. The book is very rich with lots of issues for discussion,” Jerpbak says.

Years ago, alumni say, education focused on science and included little about clinical care. “This trend makes better physicians,” says William Harrer, MD’62. “These kids start off running.” James Plumb, MD’74, MPH, says: “When I was in medical school, it was really traditional, no teaching of the doctor-patient relationship. But we did fine. We figured it out.”

Plumb believes the emphasis on patient care gives students a richer experience than students of decades ago received. He also thinks Jefferson’s team approach mirrors the realities of healthcare in ways that education once ignored, showing students the need for integrated care.

Students, Plumb finds, are generally altruistic and burning with a desire to make a change. “We have to be able to help them with that, yet maintain standards.”
GROSS ANATOMY

For several years, Jefferson's anatomy course has been called Human Form and Development. Just as the name has changed, so have the methods for diagnosing problems.

“Anatomy is this unique experience—it’s the human body in a way you’re never going to learn it again,” says Vincent Armenti, MD, PhD ’82, who serves as co-director with Hector Lopez, MD. But because of advances in imagining technology, students spend more time today on surface anatomy. “Students study the main landmarks and the projection of the viscera within those cavities,” Lopez says.

CLINICAL SKILLS

When Phillip J. Marone, MD’57, MS’07, graduated, many procedures required 10-day hospital stays; today physicians perform many of the same procedures on an outpatient basis. The trend has presented challenges in giving students clinical experience.

“Simulation is important because of the changes,” Armenti says.

Joseph W. Sokolowski, MD ’62, remembers a great deal of contact with patients while working on wards. By the time George P. Valko, MD, graduated in 1986, wards were no longer standard in hospitals. Still, Harrer says, “There are wonderful opportunities for students to learn clinical care. What students know now, it took us awhile to learn.”
Marone and Sokolowski suggest that today’s clinical realities have changed the relationships between students and faculty, leaving less time for in-depth conversations. “It used to be you’d see five or six patients. Now, you’re seeing 15 or 16 with seven different problems,” Valko says. Harrer attributes the increase to the financial pressures of Medicare and HMOs.

“With less time to spend with each patient, the key now more than ever is to listen, to watch for the signs and the symptoms,” Harrer says. “This is what Jefferson has always preached.”

In the years since Sokolowski graduated, educators began viewing students as adults, not “young adults” in transition. Changes in teaching techniques followed. “We’ve learned a lot about teaching adults, so we vary the way we teach,” Jerpbak says. “We have classroom time and experiential learning. They do reading and write reflection papers.”

The new techniques take students out of the classroom early in the Health Mentors Program, now in its second year. Groups of students get paired with patients, or mentors, and visit with them several times to learn about their lives, their illnesses and their challenges. “Not only do they learn from their mentor, they learn from each other,” Jerpbak says. “We can talk about [how to be a physician], you can see it on a screen, you can experience it in a 15-minute office visit.”
but the real thing develops over time by going through things with people. By the end of the year, some groups have really bonded.”

In another change that accommodates different learning styles, students can download audio and video of their lectures from the university Web site and play them on MP3 players. The tapes allow students to review the lectures but also allow faculty members to “invent” time by posting “lectures” on line and then spending class time discussing the material, Jerpbak says.

WHITE COAT CEREMONY

Since 2001, Jefferson has welcomed new students with a “White Coat Ceremony,” a celebration for family and friends where students recite the Hippocratic Oath for the first time, then don the familiar white coat, the symbol of a physician’s knowledge and responsibility toward the patient.

This year the 255 members of the Class of 2012 heard from Richard C. Wender, MD, PGAFPX’82, alumni professor and chair of the Department of Family and Community Medicine, who told them to be courageous when wearing the white coat, to avoid arrogance and to work to change the disparities in healthcare.

First-year student Tamar Berger, 23, of Stanford, Calif., said that the faculty speeches left her feeling “inspired, moved [and] ready to live up to everything this coat represents.”

Marone thinks the ceremony is a good idea “because it makes them part of the profession.” Harrer believes the ceremony plays the important role of introducing the students to their ethical responsibilities. “It gives them an idea of what they’re going to do for the rest of their lives early on,” he says.

Faculty Support

To identify the interprofessional needs and interests of Jefferson faculty members, JCIPE conducted a survey in December 2007. Faculty responses commonly addressed the need to learn more about other professions. In response, JCIPE designed several tools to foster interprofessional connections, starting with the development of standardized information about the education and responsibilities of the various health professions at Jefferson. This resource—and accompanying videos of each profession—will be posted on the JCIPE Web site.

JCIPE unveiled the standardized information and videos in September at a faculty networking event. The event was the first in a series to provide Jeffersonians an opportunity to meet and explore joint ventures in education, research and related scholarly activities in a relaxed environment.

A more formal forum for interaction took place on October 23 at JCIPE’s first conference, Interprofessional Care for the 21st Century: Redefining Education. Ivy Oandasan, director of the Office of Interprofessional Education at the University of Toronto, spoke during the daylong event about the successes of her office. Faculty exchanged information and cultivated common learning opportunities while attending three workshops: Chronic Disease Management, Incorporating Communication Skills Training into Health Professions Curricula and Interprofessional Education Knowledge and Skills Development. The center will offer mini-grants to develop interprofessional projects.

Health Mentors Program Grows

JCIPE’s Health Mentors Program, in its second year, welcomed new students in September, bringing the total number of participants to approximately 1,000. “No one around the country is managing these kinds of numbers,” says Christine Arenson, MD, co-director of the program. Scheduling has been difficult, but the colleges are beginning to build in “protected time” for meetings.

In the Health Mentors program, students from across campus are linked for two years with patients, or mentors, living with one or more chronic conditions. Students discover the roles and functions of professionals in a healthcare team and practice patient interviewing, active listening and other communication skills while exploring current issues in healthcare. Students from pharmacy, public health and couple and family therapy were added to the teams this fall.

“Our evaluations from the first year were good, but we did learn some lessons,” says Molly Rose, CRNP, PhD, co-director of the center. The groups will spend more time on team building, and students will receive more directed tasks, such as preparing patient education materials, before they meet their mentor. Faculty will model interprofessional teamwork, showing students how to take a history, for example. The directors said they also will make sure students understand exactly what “chronic illness” means because many in the first year seemed disappointed when their mentor did not appear “sick.”

Move4Health

In September 2007, a faculty team that included Danielle Snyderman, MD, (Jefferson Medical College), Kellie Smith, RN, MSN, (Jefferson School of Nursing), and Christine Wade, MS, PT, (Jefferson School of Health Professions, department of physical therapy) attended an institute sponsored by the Association for Prevention Teaching and Research. The institute promoted innovative change in healthcare education through several fronts, including expansion of interprofessional prevention initiatives on campus. The team returned to enhance Move4Health (M4H), a student-designed and -led 13-week program for female diabetics. The program focuses on self-efficacy, quantitative measures of blood pressure, body mass index and... hemoglobin A1C through an exercise-based education program. In the program, physicians from the JMC department of family and community medicine work with medical, physical therapy and nursing students. The faculty assists students with program development and evaluation with a focus on interprofessional collaboration and teamwork. The team also developed three online learning modules for students. The topics, which were chosen based on interviews with M4H students, include teaching, teamwork, interprofessional roles in prevention education and introduction to chronic disease prevention. Evaluation tools include reflective writing exercises targeted toward attitudes regarding interprofessional collaboration. The faculty also uses a modified version of the Perception of Patients’ Health Scale, which determines students’ perceptions of how a patient with chronic illness may answer questions focused on assessing center of control, certainty, self-awareness and importance of health.

The M4H faculty team was selected to present its findings at two conferences, including Preventive Medicine 2008 in Austin, Texas, where the team’s poster received a nomination for best at the conference.

FUTURE DEVELOPMENTS

The center’s steering committee is examining several interdisciplinary areas for additional programs, including quality and safety initiatives. “One of our major focuses for the next year is to look at how we can bring education into the clinical improvement activities,” says Arenson.
Robert Brent, MD, received the 2008 Distinguished Alumnus Award from the University of Rochester, which recognizes significant achievement on a national and global scale.

Theodore A. Christopher, MD, FACEP, professor and chair of the department of emergency medicine, was elected president of the Philadelphia County Medical Society. He has served the society in many different capacities since 2002, including serving on the Board of Directors and on the Caucus Resolution and Membership Committees and as a liaison to the Philadelphia Department of Public Health. Christopher will serve a one-year term.

“I am extremely honored to serve as president of this prestigious society,” says Christopher. “Through an open and honest discourse between physicians and the general public, we can continue to address the many important public health problems that exist in our community.”

Gerald A. Isenberg, MD, director of undergraduate education in the department of surgery and associate professor of surgery, was elected president of the Association of Program Directors for Colon and Rectal Surgery. He will serve a three-year term.

“I am extremely honored to serve as president of this national association,” says Isenberg. “As president, it is my goal to create a standardized system of evaluation for colorectal fellows, as well as to update the core competencies for all colorectal training programs.”

The David C. Levin Chair of Radiology Honors Former Head of Department

Vijay M. Rao, MD, FACR, professor and chair of the department of radiology, has been named to the first endowed chair in the department’s history. This endowment honors the former chairman of the department, David C. Levin, MD, who led the department for 16 years. New York businessman Arthur S. Penn bestowed a generous gift to Jefferson to create the chair honoring Levin.

“It is my honor to be the first radiologist to hold this endowed chair in Dr. Levin’s name,” said Dr. Rao. “Dr. Levin has had an illustrious career and been a national leader in the field. He was a friend and mentor to me and I am delighted to be able to follow in his footsteps.”

“Dr. Rao is recognized around the world as one of the leading experts in head and neck imaging. She has provided outstanding leadership since she assumed the radiology chair six years ago. She tirelessly works to keep Jefferson a leading institution in radiological research, so it is fitting that she been named as the holder of the first chair in the department’s history honoring a physician she can so closely identify with in research pursuits and diagnostic ability,” said Michael Vergare, MD, interim dean.

Lifetime of Innovative Research in Nuclear Medicine

Mathew Thakur, PhD, professor of radiology and radiation oncology/nuclear medicine, received the 2008 Cassen Prize in recognition of his outstanding contributions to the science and practice of nuclear medicine from the Society of Nuclear Medicine’s Education and Research Foundation. Thakur presented the Cassen Lecture on “Genomic Biomarkers for Molecular Imaging: Predicting the Future.” Thakur is also the director of laboratories of radiopharmaceutical research molecular imaging, nuclear medicine research and is a member of the Kimmel Cancer Center.

Throughout his 35-year career, Thakur has developed several widely used radiopharmaceuticals that have improved diagnostic accuracy and ultimately improved patient care. They have also developed methods to produce and separate medically useful radioisotopes and many radioactive compounds. Among the better known are Krypton-81m, which has significant value as an agent used in nuclear medicine for lung ventilation studies. The agent was available commercially in the United States and is still being used in Europe. He also developed Indium-111-Bleomycin, an agent that has proven very useful for detecting and treating specific cancerous tumors, of the head and neck.

The major thrust of Thakur’s current research is on targeting genomic biomarkers— with specific radioactive molecules for early detection of breast and prostate cancer, a critical need. His contributions have been recognized by his peers previously with the Society of Nuclear Medicine’s Georg de Hevesy Award (2000), the V. Sarabhai Award (1995); the Paul Aebersold Award (1992); and the American Chemical Society’s Maurice S. Chamberland Award (1980).
Howard H. Weitz, MD, was named the new director of the division of cardiology in the department of medicine. He was also named the director of the Jefferson Heart Institute. Weitz replaces Bernard L. Segal, MD, who after 10 years as the director of the division will become director emeritus of the division of cardiology while continuing his active practice in cardiovascular medicine.

Weitz has been at Jefferson for more than 30 years. He is nationally recognized as a clinician and educator. Since 1992 he has served as an associate editor of the American College of Physicians Medical Knowledge Self-Assessment Program and is one of the leading experts on pre- and post-operative evaluation of patients with cardiovascular disease who are undergoing non-cardiac surgery. He has published widely on cardiovascular disease, lectured at major national meetings and has co-directed major national courses on management of the surgical patient with medical problems. In addition, he has served as a member of the American Heart Association-American College of Physicians Task Force on Clinical Competence.

Glenn J.R. Whitman, MD, was appointed director of the surgical cardiac care unit. Previously he was director of transplantation at Temple and professor of surgery there. He is board certified in surgery and thoracic surgery.

Benjamin Youdelman, MD, was appointed assistant professor of surgery in the division of cardiothoracic Surgery. He graduated from Saint Louis University School of Medicine and did his cardiothoracic surgery residency at Drexel. He did a fellowship at the University of Pennsylvania in thoracic and endovascular aortic surgery.

Neurosurgery Milestone
Since 1994, Robert H. Rosenwasser, MD, professor and chair, department of neurological surgery and his associates—including Erol Veznedaroglu, MD, associate professor and director, division of neurovascular surgery and endovascular surgery, and Kenneth Liebman, MD, assistant professor in the department—have treated more than 4,100 cases involving intracranial aneurysms.

US News and World Report
Thomas Jefferson University Hospital has again been ranked as the top hospital in Philadelphia for orthopaedics and rehabilitation medicine by U.S. News & World Report in their 2008 Best Hospitals survey. This ranking translates into the 15th best hospital in the nation for orthopaedic surgery and the 12th best in the U.S. for rehabilitation medicine.

American Cancer Society CEO Honored
John R. Seffrin, PhD, chief executive officer of the American Cancer Society, addressed the 184th annual commencement exercises for Jefferson Medical College. He received an honorary doctor of science degree during the ceremony on May 30.

THE CLASS OF 2012
The 255 students enrolled in the Class of 2012 come from richly varied backgrounds. They include several specializing in finance, a naval officer, a member of the Secret Service, police officers, an engineer at a think tank, EMTs, a West Point graduate, medical researchers and Peace Corps alumni. They come from across the United States (26 states) and from small Caribbean nations, plus Canada, Nigeria, India, the Philippines, Albania, Iran and Poland.

Student Profile
• Number of students enrolled: 255
• Number of students accepted: 491
• Number of students applied: 9,323
• Number of female students: 123
• Male students: 132
• Number underrepresented in medicine: 28
• Number who hold master’s degrees: 14
• Number enrolled through the DIMER (Delaware) program: 21
• Number in the Penn State BS/MD program: 24
“Triple Rule-Out” CT Scan for Acute Coronary Syndrome

Chest pain is the second most common complaint when patients go to the emergency room, accounting for 6 million visits annually. Determining the cause of patients’ symptoms whether it be a heart attack or some other life-threatening entity like a blood clot in the lungs is challenging since the symptoms often overlap. Thomas Jefferson University Hospital is at the forefront of institutions evaluating a “triple rule-out” protocol with coronary computed tomographic angiography (CCTA) for low-to-moderate risk patients presenting with symptoms suspicious for acute coronary syndrome (ACS). The “triple rule-out” CCTA provides a non-invasive, rapid and accurate approach for the proper diagnosis or exclusion of ACS.

Results from the first 200 emergency room patients evaluated with “triple rule-out” CCTA published in Radiology show that the triple scan, used to evaluate coronary disease, pulmonary embolism and aortic dissection, may expedite care of patients who come to the emergency department with symptoms of a heart attack. The triple rule-out protocol showed that 76 percent of the patients with symptoms mimicking heart disease did not suffer from ACS. Eleven percent of patients had a non-cardiac cause that included some life-threatening diagnoses such as pulmonary embolism and aortic dissection. With regards to coronary artery disease, five percent of patients had severe disease and six percent had moderate disease that was immediately recognized by CCTA. These results demonstrate the potential of the “triple rule-out” CCTA to reduce costs, limit the amount of inpatient observation and evaluation for suspected ACS and allow better treatment with more time-sensitive diagnoses.

“Triple rule-out coronary CT angiography provides noninvasive visualization of coronary arteries with simultaneous evaluation of the pulmonary arteries, thoracic aorta and other intra-thoracic structures that might explain signs and symptoms that overlap with ACS,” said Ethan J. Halpern, MD, director of cardiac CT, and co-author of the study. “Furthermore, the examination time and radiation exposure are less than that required for a conventional nuclear stress test, which is most often used to evaluate these patients.”

“Standard medical practice tends to be very cautious when a patient presents with symptoms suggesting ACS by performing a battery of tests and sometimes lengthy hospital stays to determine the source of pain,” adds Kevin Takakuwa, MD, assistant professor, department of emergency medicine, and co-author of the study. “This traditional approach in diagnosis wastes millions of dollars in unnecessary healthcare costs, but if we can find a way to rapidly rule out ACS as early as possible and more accurately diagnose patients’ problems, we can potentially save millions of dollars and a lot of time.”

Triple rule-out using coronary CT scans helped to appropriately triage patients who presented to the Jefferson Chest Pain Center and allowed them to be discharged from the hospital earlier, with no adverse events at 30-day follow-up. This protocol to evaluate both coronary and non-coronary disease provides a new cost-effective and streamlined alternative diagnostic evaluation process for potential ACS patients.

Students to Develop Projects to Meet the Medical Needs of Local Communities

Four Thomas Jefferson University students recently received Albert Schweitzer Fellowships, allowing each to improve access to health services for low-income communities through more than 200 hours of service in the next year. Three students — Carrie Zaslow, Elizabeth Daly and Cameron Bass — will help the homeless with Project HOME, an advocacy group for Philadelphia’s underserved, and the Ridge Avenue Shelter in Philadelphia. Carrie Zaslow, from the Medical College, will focus on nutrition. The four are among 12 Schweitzer Fellows from the Philadelphia area.
Another First for Jefferson

Jefferson Pharmacy: First Class

The Jefferson School of Pharmacy welcomed 76 students to the Class of 2012 this September, becoming the first pharmacy school to open in Philadelphia in 107 years.

“We were delighted with the academic quality and level of pharmacy experience, community service and extracurricular activities of the applicants,” says Rebecca Finley, PharmD, dean of Jefferson School of Pharmacy. “It’s been a fun process to meet these individuals, learn about their backgrounds and realize how much they will learn from each other. They have tremendous life experiences.”

The students come from 21 states, including California, Arizona, Florida, Wisconsin and Nebraska; about a quarter come from the Philadelphia region.

The students will take one practical experience section each semester, beginning in the fall with service learning at a free clinic such as a senior center; the Jeff Hope clinic, which serves the homeless; or the Mazzoni Center, Philadelphia’s LGBT health center.

“A lot of the students have a strong background in community service,” says Finley. “We think they’ll really embrace this opportunity to begin exploring pharmacy out in the community. Students will be exposed to people who have challenges receiving healthcare. They will also have the chance to work with students and professionals from medicine, nursing, social work and other fields because each of these sites incorporates interprofessional practice.”

As the students and faculty settle in, Finley recognizes and appreciates the support the university community has offered. “We are grateful to everyone who has helped us prepare to welcome this first class,” Finley says.

Cameron Bass, Philadelphia
Elizabeth Daly, Yardley, Pa.

Bass and Daly will work as partners on a project based at St. Elizabeth’s Medical Center, a clinic operated by Project HOME in North Philadelphia. Bass and Daly will focus on patients who have difficulty managing chronic conditions, such as diabetes and hypertension, because of economic, social and educational barriers to healthcare.

“Our aim is to improve the quality of life for these patients by helping them understand their diagnosis and learning how to manage it better,” said Bass. “Both Cameron and I are sure this experience will enhance our medical training and will help us grow as compassionate caregivers.”

Megan Riley, Shavertown, Pa.

Riley plans to start a diabetes intervention program called “Taking Charge of Your Sugar” at the Ridge Avenue Shelter for homeless men. In a revolving 10-week program, Riley will combine physical activity and health education for diabetics.

“Working with this population will be challenging because, for the most part, the population at the shelter is always fluctuating,” said Riley. “This project will help me explore and challenge my perception of the homeless and allow me to grow as a professional caregiver.”

Carrie Zaslow, Los Angeles

Carrie, in collaboration with community agencies, will offer “mini-courses” on reading and understanding nutrition labels and how to shop smart. Carrie’s courses will combine interactive lectures and discussions and provide take-home educational materials. “I was thrilled when I learned that I had been selected as an Albert Schweitzer Fellow,” said Zaslow. “I am so excited to build my project from the ground up and turn it into reality for the people who need it most.”

The Fellowship

The Albert Schweitzer Fellowship is a national nonprofit organization that focuses on developing leaders in community health service. The fellows, who receive a $2,000 stipend, provide services to those most in need in the spirit of Albert Schweitzer, MD. Once fellows have completed their year of service, they join a network of 1,585 Schweitzer “Fellows for Life” across the United States and abroad. Many continue their commitment to lives of service.

Victor K. Au works in Cary, N.C., in plastic surgery. He and wife Theresa live in Burlington, N.C. His son Matthew (21) is a senior at University of Rochester and son Brian (18) entered Duke in the fall. His father, Otto Au, MD’57, resides in Hong Kong, where he has practiced plastic surgery since 1963.

J. David Cunningham was one of 47 otolaryngologists in the United States who passed sleep medicine certification boards. This was the first American Medical Board exam given to certify specialization in sleep medicine. His practice runs three sleep labs in addition to its busy otolaryngology practice in eastern North Carolina. He proudly reports that his daughter Erin Cunningham Toto graduated from Jefferson in June; she is doing an internal medicine residency at Northwestern.

Donn S. Tokairin sends “aloha” from Honolulu. He is still in private practice in OB/GYN, “though solo practice in OB is getting to be a rarer commodity these days.” His twin sons major in engineering: “they saw how hard I worked and saw the light.” He invites classmates to call when they are visiting the islands.

Sandra Willingmyre is still at CAMcare Community Health Center but is happy to be a full-time clinician again now that she is no longer clinical director.

Colleagues Honor Retiring Alumnus
More than 60 colleagues gathered for a luncheon September 10, 2008, at Eakins Lounge in Alumni Hall to honor John J. Gartland, MD’44, who retired in June as chairman of the Publication Committee of the Alumni Bulletin. He took the pro bono position after retiring in 1985 as chairman of the Department of Orthopaedics, a position he held for 15 years. Pictured above from left to right: Michael J. Vergare, MD; Paul C. Correction
In the summer 2008 Alumni Bulletin, Page 20, middle column, we incorrectly listed Thomas F. Nelson Jr., MD, as a member of the team that John Gibbon Jr., MD’27, assembled at Jefferson to help him develop a successful heart-lung machine. Instead, the team of surgeons included Thomas F. Nealon Jr., MD’41.

Simon Gratz Research Prize
Simon Gratz was a Jefferson trustee and benefactor in the early years of the 20th century. A Philadelphia businessman and the scion of a family that had been prominent in the city since colonial times, he led the College Committee of the Board of Trustees and his wife chaired the Children’s Ward Committee of the Woman’s Board.

The Simon Gratz Research Prize for Jefferson Medical College alumni will be awarded in late spring 2009. The Gratz Prize is a cash award given every three years to a faculty member alumni and a non-faculty alumni (postgraduate alumni are not eligible). In accordance with the terms of the bequest, awards will be made to those alumni whose work is deemed to “have most furthered the advancement of medical or surgical treatment of disease or for research that has been productive of results having real practical value.” This work must have been completed within the preceding five-year period.

Application and supporting documents must be received no later than April 24, 2009.

For information contact: Aveniel de Lorenzo, Science Outreach Coordinator, 215-503-8990, aveniel.delorenzo@jefferson.edu.
